You can walk in during business hours which is most of the day. You can't bring signs in and bags are x-rayed. They may close them at a whim on Jan 6 though.

In normal times, you could walk in, there's a tour, and you can sit in the gallery and watch proceedings when they are in session. I have done so.

With COVID, they have a good excuse to close the gallery, stop the tours (probably already have) and make seeing your congress critter appointment only.

This year on January 6th I highly expect the entire building to be closed to the public and the congress critters will not photo op arriving by car, but will use the dedicated Capitol Subway system to get there from other office buildings.

Underground Metro stops? That's how some congress critters get there.

They have a dedicated subway system for the Capitol.

There is public access. Don't you remember Harry Reid complaining about the smelly tourists down there?

True, he did. But as I recall from my visits to DC and the tour, there were sections the public didn't have access to, like these ones:

They have to get on the damn thing somewhere.

They do--in their office buildings, listed in the provided link. There's all kinds of interesting information on the Architect Of the Capitol website. And many other government websites actually, if you have the patience to dig for it. Like the Library of Congress.

Going through all the old documents and plans for various government buildings can be fun.
